SUPPLEMENT

ORIGIN

25X1X

1. The Sino-Soviet Treaty of August 1945 provided a method of joint control and operation of the Chinese Changchun Railroad, with an equal division of profits and losses. This arrangement furnished a model for possible Sino-Soviet cooperation in heavy industrial enterprises in Manchuria and has been called the first step in the "50-50 Plan" whereby the Soviets hoped to gain joint rights with China to the industrial potentialities of Manchuria.

25X1X

2. The plan was drawn up for the Russians by Colonel Sladokovsky, well-known in diplomatic circles, "right hand man" of General Malinovsky in Manchuria, and head of the Soviet Far Eastern Bureau. He was aided by Cebbrevsky, an authority on shale oil; Linchesky, an expert on non-ferrous metals; and Marinev, a technician in the chemical industry. Studied particularly for the "50-50 Plan" were the steel, cement, coal, and shale oil industries.

25X1X

3. The Nationalists in Manchuria agreed to the Soviet proposals. They were represented by CHANG Kia-ngau, [chairman of the Northeast Economic Commission and head of the Economic Section of General Hsiung's Headquarters in Mukden. CHANG went to Nanking about March 1946 to present the plan, but it was officially repudiated.

25X1X

4. An unrelated Chinese source gave corroborating evidence of the Soviet plan and stated that Russia attempted to force China to joint industrial cooperation.

25X1X

5. The Soviets told the Chinese that war booty would be returned to Manchuria if the Chinese accepted the "50-50 Plan".
